U.S. Patent and Trademark Office PTOL-303 (Rev. 11-03) Continuation of 5. does NOT place the application in condition for allowance because: Applicant's arguments are not convincing. Applicant argues that Auer does not teach continuously displayed screen, but Auer is the primary reference providing the claimed environment. It is Tymes that has been added to teach the feature of burst techniques with computer displays. Note that Tymes clearly teaches the remote terminals with displays (Tymes col 5, lines 1-5) coupled via burst (packet) protocol (Tymes col 2, line 55 - col 3, line 18) Clearly Tymes does not intend that the displays only present data for the few millisecond of the burst. It should also be noted that the instant inventions does not claim transmitting moving picture video, rather is it in the realm of computer display. As is well known, computer displays are essentially static, so much so in fact that most computers must be equipped with screen savers to prevent the static image from burning into the display.

Regarding claim 17, note that in the proposed combination the burst would supply all of the information for the display, so of course if anything in the display were changed, the burst would have supplied the data. Note that the claim does not state that the burst ONLY contains the CHANGED data

Regarding claim 9, in the event of an appeal, a reference will be cited to replace the Official Notice.
